

Start the Conversation

Five questions to ask your parents this Sunday

Talking about the end of life feels hard — but silence is harder. These five gentle questions can open the most loving conversation your family ever has.

1

“If something happened tomorrow, would we know where to find your important papers?”

Wills, deeds, insurance, passwords, keys. Most families spend days searching during their hardest week. One answer — “it’s all in one place, here” — changes everything.

2

“If you ever couldn’t speak for yourself, what would you want your care to look like?”

Doctors will ask your family to decide. Knowing Mom or Dad’s actual wishes turns an impossible decision into an act of honoring them.

3

“Have you ever thought about what you’d want your service to be like?”

The songs, the scriptures, who speaks. Written down, it becomes a celebration planned by them — not a guessing game left to grief.

4

“What stories from your life do you most want your grandchildren to know?”

This is the question people end up loving. The recipes, the faith, the hard-won wisdom — a legacy is more than paperwork.

5

“Who should we call first — and do they know where everything is?”

The pastor, the attorney, the closest friend. One page of key contacts can spare a family a hundred frantic phone calls.

How to bring it up

Pick a calm moment, not a crisis. Lead with love: “I want to make sure we honor your wishes — can we talk about a few things?” Start with question 4 if the others feel heavy. And don’t push for everything in one afternoon — the goal is to open the door, not walk through it all at once.

Ready for the next step? The Infinity Map walks you through all of it.

A comprehensive life & legacy planning workbook — personal history, medical directives, finances, funeral wishes, and the wisdom you want to pass on. Everything your family needs, in one place.

InfinityMap.org

“Because love plans ahead.” · HomeTown Ministries International · 3 Crosses. 2 Choices. 1 Savior.